

Defining colour

It's one of the easiest ways to transform an interior – a new coat of paint can also accentuate key architectural features

No matter when your house was built it's likely you will want to revitalise the interior every few years. But this doesn't have to involve major structural changes. Sometimes all that is needed is a fresh coat of paint.

Resene SpaceCote Low Sheen is an Environmental Choice-approved paint just as well suited to older homes as new ones. The waterborne enamel is tough, durable and washable. And, in critical light areas, its reduced side sheen will minimise surface imperfections.

This page: Resene Livid Brown and Resene Midwinter Mist feature in the house at right. The house shown top and lower left has Resene Truffle on the walls, with Quarter Truffle on the ceilings.

Zylone Sheen, another Environmental Choice-approved paint. Resene Truffle features on the walls and Resene Quarter Truffle on the ceilings. Both these shades are from the Resene Whites & Neutrals fandeck, which presents a collection of the most popular whites and neutrals. Variations in strength make it easy to choose a tonal colour scheme.
